At the heart of the Northern Schools Trust is a commitment to transform the lives of children and young people through education.

The quality of learning and teaching is central to achieving this goal.

As colleagues within the Trust, we are committed to providing opportunities for our students to truly achieve their potential and not only raise aspirations but actually deliver them. To achieve this we must continue to challenge and develop our own practice. This commitment ensures we are constantly striving for 'Great' learning and teaching that is not constrained by external parameters or past experiences.

On the 19th June 2015, we came together to hear from speakers that challenged our preconceptions of teaching, and offered techniques that support us to be truly transformational.

On the 4th January 2016, we will work as one trust to embed our learning in departments across all of our schools. We will learn from our own areas of best practice. We will look at opportunities to develop as professionals and support each other. We will work as one to understand how we can practically implement the ideas from the 19th June and share the success of where this is already happening in our classrooms.

The day will focus on two key themes.

- The use of data to support teaching, save time, improve accuracy and support our creativity as practitioners.
- The value of assessment in shaping our teaching and learning strategies.

It is clear that outstanding schools who deliver outstanding practice and student progress year-on-year are based on one key foundation – continuous school based CPD. It is our ambition to be a Trust of outstanding schools and practitioners providing aspirational, transformational education for every one of our students. To do this we must all work together to share and improve so that attainment and individual progress improves for all of our schools and students. Data and Assessment are two key driving forces behind this improvement.
